

Air Motion – The High and Low of It

Introducing "Little Fingers and Hands" to Isobars

Introduction

Weather can be fair or stormy. Generally, fair weather is associated with high surface air pressure while stormy weather is associated with low surface air pressure. (Remember this is a very large over-simplification, from older days when we didn't have any better data.) Broad-scale areas of high or low surface pressure dominate weather in middle latitudes and are simply called Highs and Lows.

Highs and Lows are regions where air pressures are higher or lower compared to surrounding areas and are typically hundreds or even a thousand or more kilometers across. On a weather map, a large "H" or "HP" symbolizes the location of highest pressure in a High whereas a large "L" or "LP" symbolizes the position of lowest pressure in a Low. Highs and Lows generally travel from west to east while exhibiting at least some motion toward the north or south. As they travel, they bring changes in the weather at places in their paths.

This activity investigates: (1) the horizontal and vertical air motions in Highs and Lows, and (2) the impacts of these motions on weather at locations under the influence of Highs and Lows.

Upon completing this activity, you should be able to:

Describe the general air motions and weather conditions associated with a high pressure system, or High.

Describe the general air motions and weather conditions associated with a low pressure system, or Low.

Based upon the locations of the centers of Highs and Lows, as shown on a weather map, predict general wind directions and weather conditions for different locations.
