"Stress and Filipino "
Aracelly D. Bermeo BSBS-1C

About the article the Stress and Filipinos are apparently known for being resilient in any situation and I actually agree with that since I witnessed and applied it firsthand. However, despite the resiliency and being "masayahin", we Filipinos still tend to experience stress in our daily lives. Moreover, we cannot avoid it, since it is very inevitable and I know all of us have undergone stress at some point in our lives. As unique individuals, we also have varying approaches on coping up with stress that life brings.

These are certainly not the best of times for Filipinos, so it's not surprising that we're pretty much feeling more than the usual physical aches and pains. Sure, Filipinos are resilient, but as popular medical anthropologist Michael Tan points out in the latest i Report feature as part of our series tackling health, this doesn't necessarily mean we don't feel stressed.

Additionally, in accordance to the text that I have read, I am of the same mind as the author about poor Filipino people being more likely to get more stressed than rich ones, because this online class is a great representation of it since students who are privileged enough wouldn't understand the stress and concerns of poor students about lacks of gadgets, poor signal, insufficient load and even the difficulty in finding a good study space. Some say we're on the same boat, but actually we're not, because social class still determines the level of stress we're on right now, but we as Filipinos doesn't remove the fact that we have a very cheerful personality that even we're experiencing overwhelming stress, we still get to make jokes, laugh and even participate on Facebook memes.

Filipinos are really jolly in nature, even though we are already bombarded with a lot of stressors, we still retain the smiles on our faces. The article of Michael L. Tan on "Stress and the Filipino really defines how tough Filipinos can be, that even on our most stressful and darkest days, we still look through our rose-colored glasses and smile. I think this identity as a Filipino is good, since despite of challenges in our life, we tend to appreciate it and just smile in the face of problems.
