Over the long run, others have found various nontrade barriers, with significant effects on trade. Examples of these others include the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs, the World Trade Organization (WTO), the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) forum.

However, barriers that come within the economic definition include both barriers to trade that cannot be paid for by parties (tariffs, quotas, etc.) and barriers that require the payment of some price (the domestic supply curve) and that are not paid for by the foreign supply curve. Domestic supply curves and domestic demand curves are rising and falling, and the price of other nations' prices. If there were no international trade, the equilibrium price would be the domestic price. If there were no international trade, the equilibrium price would be the domestic price.
