

The opening paragraph establishes a clear understanding of the focus of the question and of the poem selected for analysis

Written in 1961, Plath's confessional poem "Morning Song" was penned as a response to the birth of her daughter, Frieda. The poem explores the transition into parenthood, with all its accompanying anxiety, confusion and fear, until the speaker reaches a point of eventual acceptance of her new role. The theme of a woman's identity runs through the whole collection of poems in Ariel, especially in relation to patriarchal notions of gender roles, and this links to the theme of parenthood in that women are normally associated with the maternal role.

It also makes an initial link to how the theme is reflected in the poetry collection as a whole

This paragraph focuses solely on the chosen poem, closely analysing how the writer has used language, form and structure to create a sense of alienation between mother and baby. This again retains focus on the central theme of the task – parenthood

In the opening stanza, Plath uses the simile "like a fat gold watch" drawing on the image of an individual's life beginning at the moment of birth like a watch being wound and set going. The rhythm of the line mirrors the ticking of the "watch", symbolising the beating of a heart. The rhythmic emphasis on "fat gold" conveys a tone of preciousness and desirability, suggesting the new baby is a treasure. However, the new-born baby is then suspended upside down by a midwife, like a pocket watch, objectifying the infant as a mechanical object and detaching the speaker from the humanity of her new baby.

This paragraph continues the close analysis of the chosen poem as relevant to the theme, and makes specific reference to structural features used by Plath and the effects created

This sense of detachment continues into the second stanza, with Plath using the cold imagery of "our voices echo", "drafty museum" and "shadows" to juxtapose the expected feelings of joy and elation at the birth of a new baby with ones of separation and alienation. This division between mother and child is also drawn upon in "Medusa", although this is drawn from the child's perspective of her mother being monstrous and alien. Plath uses a two-word sentence "new statue" which deliberately stands out in its unconventionality, suggesting the baby is an inanimate object that is observed rather than interacted with and nurtured. It is also jarring as a statue is cold and hard, whereas a baby is warm and soft. The speaker is viewing her new baby as an object of interest and confusion, rather than as something to love and nurture.

The paragraph also draws on a thematic link of alienation in parenthood with another of the poems from the collection
