Ritualism in Nursing and Its Effect on Patient Care Virginia H. Walker, Indiana University Medical Center, 1964

Evaluating Quality of Care M. Clinton Miller, Rebecca Grant Knapp, 1979

There is a expanding interest in the development of health care quality assurance by the professional public and private sectors Societal forces have elevated the consumer s expectations of quality in the care delivered by the health service system Although a clear set of evaluation criteria for the quality of care offered by the health care delivery team has not yet emerged we can with little deliberation envision the need for methods to analyze the data generated by these quality control and audit systems This work addresses specifically the need of participants in quality assurance programs to be able to analyze the data that they obtain It is an exposition and synthesis of available statistical methods appropriate in processing quality assurance data The emphasis is on working examples arising in common health care quality assessment situations As will be observed the methods presented are not dependent upon the existence of an accepted standardized form but are applicable to a wide range of data collection instruments
