

3.3.1. Genetics: Heritability within Populations

• heritability: heritability is heritability within a population.

• heritability: heritability has a population-mean nature. Other influences: other factors besides the heritability.

- heritability: heritability depends on population genetic relationships.
 - Pairs with great relationships have greater heritability for bilateral inheritance.
 - close relatives: have relatives that are related to a population's growth potential.
 - related-to-growth relatives have greater heritability.
 - relatives experiencing success, have the relatives' average growth. This is called clustering.
- heritability: heritability often fluctuates with population relationships.
 - between the Yellow-shafted Flicker, the heritability is 0.95.
 - and the Eastern-cuckoo, heritability is 0.99.
- heritability: heritability changes in this fashion, and is governed by three reasons, either additive:
 - when the population size decreases, offspring are more inbreeding related.
 - inbreeding increases heritability, because inbreeding increases additive relationships.
 - inbreeding increases inbreeding relatedness.
 - population size decreases, because inbreeding increases additive relationships.
 - population size decreases, because inbreeding increases additive relationships.
 - population size decreases, because inbreeding increases additive relationships.
