

North vs. South

Name _____

Growing Apart: The North and the South

The northern states had always been different from the southern states. In the early 1800s these two sections of the country grew even further apart.

The North, with its waterpower and good ports, developed into a manufacturing center. New inventions created large industries. Many people moved to cities such as Boston or New York to work in factories. Some of these people came from other countries, bringing different traditions and beliefs.

The South, with long hot summers and rich soil, had always been perfect for farming. The largest farms, called plantations, grew cotton, tobacco, rice, and sugar to trade with Europe and the North. Not as many people lived in the South as in the North. For example, in 1860 there were only about 18 people per square mile in Georgia compared to about 153 per square mile in Massachusetts.

Northern businessmen made more money using employees than they would have made with slaves. Because of the machines used in factories, each operator could produce many finished items. The young women, children, and immigrants who worked in mills of the North had to pay for their own food, clothes, and apartments. Southern cotton plantations used some machines, but most farm labor was still done by hand. Planters believed they could not make money without slaves. Slavery was phased out in the North, but it expanded in the South.

Culturally, the Northern states prized an independence of spirit. Valuing achievement over noble family names, Northerners put aside many British ways of thinking. The South took pride in tradition and kept close connections with Europe.

The United States in the 1850s was a country made up of two separate regions which had little in common. Each side longed to win the support of the growing west.

Label the two pictures below. Which matches with the North states and which matches with the South states?

North: Factory

South: Plantation
