

Part I Lecture in Police Technical Report Writing I

What is technical writing?

Technical writers have defined technical writing in many ways.

According to Estrin and Elliot (1990), technical writing is a writing that explains technology to various technical, organizational and societal audiences.

According to Sherman, the technical report is a common written form through which computer scientists communicate their findings.

To Alcantara and Espina (2003), technical writing is an exposition essentially about scientific subjects and about various technical subjects associated with the sciences.

For Vicente, et. al. (1997), technical writing is giving an account or a description of an aspect of a particular art, science, trade or profession, learned by experience, study, observation or investigation.

Based from all these definitions, we can say that technical writing is the kind of writing used by scientists, nurses, doctors, computer specialists, government officials, engineers and others in their league who possess a specialized knowledge referred to as "technical knowledge" which they use in the world of science, technology and business.

Overview of Technical Report Writing

- It is a kind of writing used by professional individuals who possess a specialized knowledge referred to as technical knowledge.
- It aims to discuss or explain something by presenting facts and data.
- It is direct to the point, impartial, objective, concise, highly specific, detailed and unemotional.
- It is written on a scientific point of view with emphasis on formal aspects

How do technical writings differ from literary writings?

All technical and literary writings aim to discuss or explain something. However, they differ in terms of subject matter, style and point of view. Technical writing in presenting facts and data is direct to the point, impartial, objective, concise, highly specific, detailed and unemotional, and is written on a scientific point of view with emphasis on formal aspects while literary writings are oftentimes subjective and are more on emotions, feelings and personal experiences.

Although both consider their readers, technical writing uses words in their denotative meanings while literary writings use figurative language as well as idioms and combine both denotation and connotation.
