Environmental costs of economic growth in China

Toxic air: China has 16 of the world's most polluted cities.

Dust storms and sulfur dioxide from coal-burning power plants and stoves

Toxic water: China is the cancer capital of the world: High esophageal and stomach cancer rate

The yellow River is being sucked dry by irrigation and is seriously polluted.

Economic growth can lift many people out of poverty

But when its growth is at the cost of natural resources and people's health. It is unsustainable

Per capita supply of freshwater in China 25% of the world average.

In northern China the per capita supply of freshwater is 20% of the supply in southern China.

Between 1972 and 1997 there were flow stoppages of the lower Yellow River in 20 of 25 years, and the number of days without any flow increased from 10 days in 1988 to 230 days in 1997.

Economics and the Environment

Two models:

Centrally planned economy: the rules decide

Cuba, North Korea

Capitalism: the market decides

Both U.S. and China are mixed models

e.g., banking, public education, health care, military, social security, national parks

International Trade

GATT (General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade): 1947-1993

WTO (World Trade Organization): 1993 –

Problems:

Imports of shrimp caught without TEDs

Products produced using child labor

Sustainable economics

Recognizes three kinds of capital:

1. Produced

2. Natural

a. Ecosystem capital, which is renewable, + nonrenewable mineral resources

3. Intangible

a. Human capital, social capital, knowledge assets
