

advantage over its competitors. Overall, the introduction of easy-to-use and affordable K-Cups contributed to the long-term success and increased profitability of GMCR.

Single-Cup Coffee: Sustainability

Such mass manufacturing of single-use packaged products quickly became the top concern of GMCR management, which set to evaluate the K-Cup system environmental impact. The GMCR then reported that K-Cup packaging only contributed to a minor proportion of their total environmental impact relative to other production stages (Gittell et al., 2012). Moreover, all the ingredients, flavors, and additives being pre-mixed were said to streamline the brewing process, arguably reducing further energy costs (Harris, 2021). Lastly, packaging for one cup helps to reduce product deterioration by avoiding air or light exposure, which makes the shelf-life longer. GMCR claims to uphold its 'brewing for a better world' values while simultaneously providing single-cup high-quality coffee.

However, concerns regarding single-use packaging remain in the coffee business. The single-use approach will most likely not be compatible with sustainability in the long run. The K-Cup components include a petroleum-based plastic pod, an inner paper filter, and aluminum foil overlaid with polyethylene ("How to recycle your K-Cup Pod", 2021). The mixed components of organics and inorganics, as well as multiple layers, make recycling K-Cups a challenge, rendering the enterprise prone to environmentalists' criticism. Hence, if GMCR continues to produce K-Cup with the polyethylene component, it may have to choose between its image as a sustainability-oriented company and its high profits.

The GMCR's leadership position in sustainable business is driven by several factors. First, it imports Fair Trade Certified Organic Coffee directly from farmers to increase their income and improve quality of life (Gittell et al., 2012). Second, GMCR obliges to consider alternatives in producing coffee with environmentally friendly components, to recycle, and to support the Global Reporting Initiative (Gittell et al., 2012). Lastly, it critically evaluates the entire production and distribution chain to identify all areas of potential improvement ("Brewing transformation", 2016). However, with the increasing popularity of competitors like Starbucks, the company will likely have to invest heavily in the single-cup business to stay on top. Therefore, if GMCR were to maintain its leadership in sustainable business while expanding its single-cup production, it would have to radically rework its current cup design to make it truly recyclable.
